A CITY OF SPRINGS · JINAN

Jinan is also known as "City of Springs", due to its many naturally occurring artesian springs which have sustained its lucky inhabitants for thousands of years. The water from these springs flows north towards the main landmark, Daming Lake, and onwards to the Yellow River.

BAOTU SPRING

Baotu Spring is the most renowned among the more than 72 named artesian springs in the downtown area of the city of Jinan. It was declared the "Number One Spring under Heaven" by the Qianlong Emperor in the Qing dynasty. With only half an hour's drive, the beautiful scenery of Baotu Spring can be discovered.

DAMING LAKE

Daming Lake is the largest lake in Jinan and one of the city's main natural and cultural landmarks. Located to the north of the historical city centre, the lake is fed by artesian karst springs and hence retains a fairly constant water level throughout the year.

SHANDONG MUSEUM

Shandong Museum, founded in 1954, is the first large-scale, provincial, integrated topographic museum in the People's Republic of China. It was established in two parts, the eastern part used to be one of the earliest museums within the boundaries of China; the western part used to be the seat of a religious society which combines Confucianism, Taoism, Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam. The former site of the eastern part was turned to the natural specimen showroom, and the western part the historical relics showroom, when Shandong Provincial Museum was founded.
